

Your single life – Apr 10

Tax breaks for married Brits?

The UK is holding a General Election next month and the parties are on the campaign trail.

The leader of the Conservative party has announced that they have plans to offer new tax breaks for married couples (the previous Married Couples' Allowance was abolished in 1999). When the party leader was interviewed on BBC Radio 5, the host asked him if this policy was discriminatory against single people. Sadly, his response is not noted on their webpage.

UK news sites are a-buzz with comments from the British public on this proposed policy, each viewpoint depending on the writer's personal situation of course.

We shall await the results of the election to see if this proposed policy becomes reality.